Building local food resilience in Leeds

The Building Food Resilience Toolkit aims to support food aid providers to use information and understand ways to help support people back to food independence.

Learning from the current food aid provision in the city system highlighted the following opportunities which we have tried to incorporate into the toolkit:

- A need to implement a ‘Making Every Contact Count’ approach across food aid providers to give staff and volunteers the confidence and skills to explore the circumstances that have resulted in the need for food aid support
- A need for clearer information on signposting opportunities in the city
- A need to share learning amongst food aid providers on different models of food aid provision to enable more to move from food parcels to other provision such as food pantries, cook and take, social supermarket, mini markets, all of which offer greater choice, ownership and dignity.

To help shape the content of the toolkit, Food Wise Leeds organised two webinars to introduce the concept of building food resilience, capture views and to showcase good practice from a range of different food aid providers who have transitioned from crisis support to approaches that enable greater food independence. The webinars can be viewed here: foodwiseleeds.org/food-resilience/

Challenges and learning

Throughout the project we have learnt more and more about the valuable, skills, knowledge and experience of food aid providers in the city and we have agreed to continue to find ways to help share good practice. The biggest challenge we have experienced has been to capture the learning and toolkit content within the timescale, as we could capture information for another 6 months. Instead, we have agreed to continue working through our networks to keep the toolkit up to date as there has been an overwhelming interest in this work.

Next steps

The Building Food Resilience Toolkit is part of the cities response to support people back to independence. The toolkit will be introduced to providers in a number of ways, including a final webinar. We are discussing the development of a training programme for food aid providers to reinforce messages from the toolkit.

The learning from the webinars is going to be written up and presented to the Council to encourage the development of a Building Food Resilience vision for the city to move forward from of the Emergency Response to Food during COVID 19.
